The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly

Remi Tupper

I am a senior creative writing major at Trinity College. I am passionate about art, social justice, comedy and cartoons. At Trinity, I work for the Women and Gender Resource Action Center during the year, and this summer I am also working in the Watkinson Library on campus.

Kyrè William-Smith

My name's Kyrè William-Smith. I am a junior at Trinity College studying English and the classics with a focus in history and creative writing. While I spend most of my free time walking around listening to music and jotting down ideas that pop into my head every now and again, I find myself most in my element when I am in my room with my music finishing a paper. Nothing is more exciting than a couple of papers and a good argument.

1. Radcliffe Bailey

American Born, 1968

Storm, c. 2012

Gouache with collage on paper

Born in New Jersey but raised in the south, Bailey's artwork reflects his life in the south and his life as an African American man. This piece made with both dull and bright colors gives the feeling of a struggle as if the light is trying to break through the storm and illuminate the waters. While, the silhouette in the background braves the storm waiting for the sun to shine through the rough times, with the spear in the foreground possibly symbolizing battle or connections to his African heritage.
